Dr. Joseph Corbin

Associate Professor of Environmental Studies

Southern New Hampshire University

Joseph Corbin is an Associate Professor of Environmental Studies at SNHU since 2009. In 2013 he partnered with the SNHU Center for Community Engaged Learning to develop SNHU's first science based service learning project. He and three of his colleagues used an interdisciplinary approach to create a service learning project that would educate and engage students in the Manchester community around water quality. It was clear from the beginning that Dr. Corbin had a passion for innovative teaching methods and was ready to embrace all that service learning had to offer. Though it was a collaborative effort, his leadership resulted in two rain gardens on campus that will hopefully result in cleaner soil and streams. More importantly, was the process in which this all took place. Dr. Corbin was engaging and willing to try anything to make the project a success. He has a way with college students that make them want to learn. He has amazing vision that has resulted in some great ideas, strong partnerships, and new service learning projects.
